21 September, 2015

For the second consecutive year, Robben Island Museum received a Clean Audit Award from the Auditor-General.

In April the World Heritage Site received its first award for a boasting a clean audit for the 2013/2014 financial year. The latest award is for the 2014/2015 financial year.

Robben Island Museum chief executive officer Dr Sibongiseni Mkhize, who has been at the helm of the museum since 2010, says the award was one of the proudest moments for the three-man executive team he heads and the museum's council.

“The award is the outcome of a collective effort by the council, management and the entire staff of Robben Island Museum,” says Mkhize.

What the award also showed was that Robben Island Museum was uncompromising in its adherence to the principles of good corporate governance.

Mkhize said: “The biggest challenge facing Robben Island Museum is to ensure that this high level of performance is sustained. It is important that the museum builds on this success by constantly strengthening its control environment while also making it possible for it to deliver constantly high quality of service for its visitors.”

Robben Island Museum's latest financial statements, and performance information are contained in its 2014/2015 annual report which has been tabled at Parliament.
